Appomattox high school defeated Concord high school 8 to 1 yesterday. Carter pitcher for Appomattox, struck out 10 men, allowed 4 hits, and received errorless support. Bullock, of Concord, allowed but three hits, one being a triple by Jack Martin.

THE RELIEF FUND APPEAL

From Europe every hour comes new and agonizing details of destruction and human misery. War in all its horror and brutality is being waged on old men, women and children as well as on the uniformed forces. Hundreds of thousands are fleeing headlong before ruthless invasion. They go with little hope. They leave behind their homes and their means of livelihood. Their flight is menaced by destruction from the air and from death-dealing weapons on every side.

To their aid the American Red Cross is rushing medical and hospital supplies, surgical dressings, ambulances and warm clothing. It has called upon the people of America to express their symnathy for these innocents victims by the raising of at least te, millions of dollars for their relief.

That, in a nutshell, is the appeal made by the Red Cross. The Rev. L.C. Shearer heads the committee in Appomatox county. Give your best.

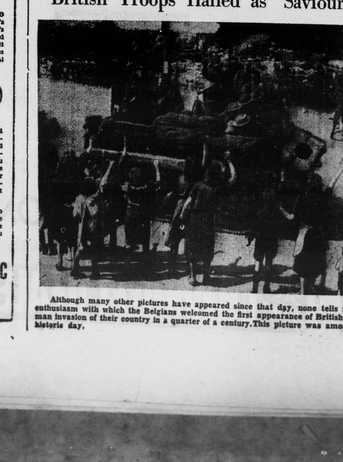
New Stage for Theater of War

Blacked-out areas of the map show countries already involved in the Second World war. The Netherlands, Belgium and Luxembourg have been added to those nations invaded by German troops.

'Uneasy Lies the Head That Wears a Crown'

Rulers of the three nations recently invaded by the war juggernaut of Germany are, left to right: The Grand Duchess Charlotte of Luxembourg, King Leopold of Belgium, and Queen Wilhelmina of The Netherlands. Control of these nations would give Germany the advantage of air bases much closer to England.

British Troops Hailed as 'Saviours of Belgium'



Although many other pictures have appeared since that day, none tells more clearly than the above the enthusiasm with which the Belgians welcomed the first appearance of British troops to combat the second German invasion of their country in a quarter of a century. Iroquois Indian Tribes Used Communistic Plan

The American Indian didn't have the name for it, but he was a Communist just the same, it seems.

Moreover, even under administration of the federal government, he still is to a certain extent.

Dr. Philip H. Riegel of Buffalo, N. Y., authority on Indian history and customs, reveals that he has found ample evidence that communism thrived on this continent long before the Russians thought of Bolshevism. According to Dr. Riegel, the Iroquois tribes were operating their communistic form of government successfully in what is now New York state when white reached these shores.

"The Indians' lands were held in common," he said in a college discussion. "When lands were sold to whites each Indian received his share of the return."

This principle of common ownership continues today, with the federal government distributing equally among tribe members the profits resulting from lease of reservation lands and operation of mines located on them.

Describing other communistic aspects of the Iroquois tribal government, Dr. Riegel said:

"Individual ownership was limited entirely to clothing, hunting implements and ornaments. Aristocracy was scrupulously avoided. A chief had no benefits above other members of a tribe. Material awards did not attend his position. He attained his place merely by merit.

"There was a head to this communistic government. He had a cabinet of five members and a legislature. Although it was the woman's lot to do menial labor, she nevertheless had a recognized place in the councils of the people. Her opinions were sought and respected."

The Iroquois' communism differed from Russia's Bolshevism in that the Indian worshiped a deity, believed in life after death and prayer, and practiced the confessional as part of his religion.

California Lava Beds

The Lava Beds National monument in California presents many interesting features, geological as well as historical. Despite the warm summers of this section of California, a number of the caves, formed by lava flows, contain ice formations which never melt. Frozen during a long period of years, the caves have taken on the beauty of crystal stalactites and stalagmites, with solid columns of ice. Other caverns show strange lacework designs made by the lava drippings. Much of the surface of the area is formed by hollowy lava. Scientists explain that this flowed like thick molasses from scores of fissures in the earth's crust. The material is still so unaffected by weathering that it appears to have been molten only a few months ago. This is the type of lava known in Hawaii as Pahoehoe.

Race Track 'Electric Eye'

Installation of the so-called electric eye to photograph finishes on race tracks has produced an interesting picture of the past, when judging them by eye was rampant, or worse. Statistics show that previous to the camera business an average total of ten dead heats registered on all tracks in this country and Canada was considered rather high, writes C. M. Gibbs in the Baltimore Sun. Since the electric eye has been in vogue the average on American tracks alone has been between 70 and 80 a year. This either shows how many dead heats the judges used to miss or that horses are more evenly matched since the camera's introduction.

Under-Ocean Mountains

A striking feature of the floor of the Atlantic ocean is an S-shaped ridge running from north to south throughout very nearly its entire length. The ocean depth above this ridge averages from 9,000 to 10,000 feet, but on each side the floor of the Atlantic sinks into valleys 15,000 to 17,000 feet below the surface. The highest peaks of this submarine mountain range project above the water, forming the islands of the Azores group, as well as St. Paul Ascension and Tristan da Cunha.

Imaginary Fear Cited As Cause of 'Fatigue'

Fatigue, in the opinion of Dr. George Ross Wells, Hartford, Conn., psychologist, is "the most devastating force in individual life today."

This fatigue, he warned, is seldom the result of physical or emotional effort, but from "long periods of going too fast, and being harried by fears, of which most are purely imaginary.

"Many of us find life too hard, too drab, too difficult, because we are fatigued."

In such cases, he said, no benefit can be obtained from a change of activity. He prescribed complete rest, recreation, and even loafing as the best means of combatting the distress.

Fears and prejudices, he said, "were taught us," and "most of us were born into many of the beliefs we hold today."

A reasonably happy life can be obtained, Dr. Wells declared, by "avoiding the adverse effects of outside interference" and by pursuing a definite goal within reason.
